OUR SQUAD OF SAVIORS
Anesa Miller

On the eve of your 64th birthday, you hit the floor, and the flower of American manhood burst into our house.

Don't call, you insisted at first, but your eyes threatened to flutter out of focus forever, and I disobeyed.

Not three, not four—a procession of seven firefighters passed through our door. Two checked your vitals. One gauged your wits with questions: “One hundred and three—how many degrees of fever is that?” One jotted down your prescriptions. And three stood by, packed into our dining nook, ready to wrestle you onto the gurney.

In Honor of Jaak
Stephen Porges

For those of us, who have known, loved, and interacted with Jaak, his passing saddened us. My relationship with Jaak spans almost 40 years. During this period, our paths frequently crossed. As we matured as scientists we found ourselves as well-matched translators of the neurobiology of social behavior and emotional regulation to clinical and applied areas. We were on dozens of programs together, often as the only neuroscientists. On a personal level, his death triggered in me the neurobiological ripples that we learn to associate with the passing of those who are closest to us.

Pat Ogden informed me of Jaak's passing and noted that he was the “first of us to go.” Pat's comment framed and personalized the experience. As we matured we saw an expansive future in which our work will have application. Many of us, including Pat and Beisel on our kolk, frequently have been on the same program with Jaak. Both Jaak and I were invited into the trauma world through Beisel's annual Boston Trauma meetings and Marion Solomon's Lifespan Learning Institute meetings on attachment and trauma.

I met Jaak about 40 years ago at a workshop organized by Peter Levine and Jim Prescott at Esalen entitled The Biology of the Affected Brain. To put this in perspective, both Jaak and I, as enthusiastic young professors, were dropped into the world of the human potential movement. At Big Sur, in contrast to our familiar academic settings we were exposed to the beautiful views from the Whim bath and the wonderful discussions at this meeting. Rather than laboratory research and seminars, we were sitting on large pillows listening to John Lilly talk about his experiences with dolphins, sensory deprivation, and isolation (or as he called it, return to). This went on for a week that included hearing John Money discuss gender assignment and gender changing surgeries and Peter Levine demonstrating the effects of owning a CO2 as a therapeutic aid.

The meeting at Esalen provided a true bonding moment and served as an opportunity to expand and bridge our interests from the laboratory to the clinic and from psychological constructs to a greater understanding of the wisdom and intelligence of the body.

STROLL STROLL

NeuroStroll™

To Reach Your Goal, Take A NeuroStroll™.

Each participant will receive a NeuroStroll™ Guidebook to use throughout the stations. This provides a personal space to do some reflective writing and thought exercises, and a way to take home the experience. Stations also involve some group discussion and activities, and each includes an introduction to relevant areas of the brain. The Guidebook contains the Exercise sheets used during the NeuroStroll™ and a multi-color custom designed brain graphic, giving a visual map for this information.

Participants keep the Guidebook, now customized through their own experience on the NeuroStroll, for their ongoing use in meeting their goal(s). The complete take-home Guidebook also includes summaries about mind, brain, and goal science at the NeuroStroll™ stations, as well as further resources and references.

The NeuroStroll™ was designed and developed by Marcia Ruben, an Associate Professor at Golden Gate University and executive leadership coach, and Debra Pearce-McCall, a consulting psychologist, and, whose careers involve decades of executive coaching and consulting, leadership development, teaching, research, and writing. And these days, they do this all with the brain in mind!

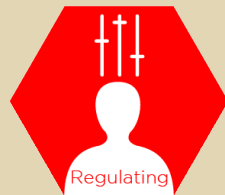

The NeuroStroll™ experience can be customized in several ways, depending upon your organization's needs. Our goal is that each participant learns how to use the NeuroStroll™, a tour through our mind and brain capacities, as a personalized and impactful set of tools to make and sustain positive changes.
